Making Sense of Insecurity: A Defence of Richard Sennett's Sociology of Work

Dale Tweedie
Macquarie University, Sydney

ABSTRACT

This paper defends Richard Sennett's sociology of work under 'new capitalism' against claims that his analysis lacks empirical foundation and methodological rigour. While studies of aggregate labour market trends in recent criticisms imply that predications of an 'end of work' or 'age of insecurity' are premature, the paper demonstrates that Sennett's sociology is not committed to these predications. Instead, his research provides a targeted critique of specific management practices, and of those social transformations that share the same ethos. More constructively, Sennett's sociology articulates a unique concept of workplace insecurity, and raises pressing issues in contemporary experiences of work and citizenship, rather than – as critics presuppose – in workers' contractual conditions as such.
